GANDHARA DAYLILIES

(A Hybridizer's Garden)

DAYLILY (HEMEROCALLIS)

The botanical name of daylily is Hemerocallis, a member of the lily family Liliaceae. It is not a bulb, nor a rhizome, nor it is a tuber. Daylilies are very easy and rewarding plants to grow. Once planted and established daylilies are almost maintenance and pest free.

Planting Location:

Daylilies are one of the most adaptable of all garden perennials available today. They will grow in varied temperatures, cold regions to hot areas in full sun or partial shade.

Soil Preparation:

Daylilies do not like wet feet, so dig in soil well to a depth of one foot at least and add leaf mold, composted cow manure and builders sand in proportion to the area, while preparing beds for proper drainage.

Planting:

Form a small mound in the bottom of a well dig hole and spread the roots over it. Cover them with soil, tamp down and water. Does not plant too deeply just cover the top of the crown with one inch of soil. Give each plant at least 1.5 to 2 feet space to spread. Ideal time for planting is early autumn to early spring.

Watering:

Watering is most important in spring when plants are making scapes and buds and in summer during bloom season. Water them on regular basis rest of the year as required.

Fertilizer:

Fertilizing requirements are simple. Do not apply any fertilizer when planting. Give a side dressing of a balanced slow release fertilizer (NPK), after six weeks when the plants have settled in and new foliage growth starts. Repeat feeding on monthly basis. Do not fertilize in hot months.
